SECTOR.

In LONDON the CITY and the districts adjacent to railway stations suffered particularly from the bombing. There is not a single main road which one can drive straight through. There have been hits on Fenchurch and BUSTON Stations but they are working. There is a noticeable effort to destroy telephone exchanges. Bombs have fallen on the telephone exchange in HOWLAND STREET. Business life is now suffering seriously, not only from delayed-action bombs, since whole districts have been evacuated but it is difficult to move about town. I think most of the heavy damage in London is not to military targets but to civilian property. Usually they need three or four air-raids to destroy military targets.

[62 groups missed].

The delayed-action bombs have generally been 10-50 kg ones I doubt as report that the one-ton bomb which lay for three days at a depth of 10 metres in the CITY was a delayed-action one. It is relatively quiet during the day and worst at night. The noise of the A.A. guns and the shelling makes it impossible to work. The general state of tension and [6% the] among [1 group unidentified]] is increasing. The number of homeless families is growing. In the evening the people, spontaneously and without the authorities' permission, move into the Underground and every possible tunnel to spend the night. The numerous above-ground shelters are only haphazardly by people sheltering from the rain of A.A. shrapnel makes it dangerous to move about town.

 ation of the SHETLAND Isles, Iceland and Ireland. He considers that SAUSAGE-DEALERS have adequate naval forces for this operation since the NOBILITY [SHAT'] [iii] has reported that the British have brought destroyers into the THAMES and are evacuating EASTBOURNE.
